But the new addition to the MacBook lineup is more than just a Siri-like tool: The MacBook Air now includes True Tone technology. True Tone is designed to adapt the display colors of the laptop to match the colors of your surroundings, making everything on the screen look good, no matter where you are. Not surprisingly, the new MacBook Pro is True Tone. That said, if you're a MacBook Air owner, you don't need to upgrade. You already have the tools to let you control changes made on your iPad and other iOS devices. You can also get video chat support in Skype and FaceTime, and download fonts from the iTunes App Store. The New Polaroid smart capture is one of the few smart capture options in the comparison. It's a good idea and it's reliable, but the results are better if you shoot in RAW. The RAW-only option is really only good for short exposures and not as effective at compensating for camera shake as full-format RAW. If you live in a very snowy area, shoot in RAW, use the new RAW smart capture, and take the olden-fashioned approach, and you should be able to get usable shots. The smart capture is better for shooting in bright areas because it compensates for lighting changes in your scene. It also doesn't slow down your camera at all, making it great for fast shooting, especially in sporting events. Of course, more than one person can use the same camera to capture composites, making this a good option for sports photographers looking to swap parts in and out.
