I'm a frontend developer, so my natural skill set involves building HTML pages and templates, not managing servers and servers configs. I have to help my boss build a webmail client, and I'm not terribly happy with the idea of building it from scratch, so I was thinking of rewriting it in PHP. I found this tutorial and it looked like a very good fit for what we were looking for. At a glance, it appears to offer template based e-mails out of the box, which is exactly what we were looking for. My problem is that the tool looks very similar to products like Dreamweaver, which are very expensive. I looked up Dreamweaver's prices (here: cheap Dreamweaver) and this is the closest match I found: Is there any reason to pay that kind of money for a webmail client? Is this really the best way to accomplish what we're looking for? A: If you're moving to a different platform, the skills are the same, and the templates are built in and built out from scratch (not changing a piece of code to build out the mail templates). With that said, not only is this possible for you, I'd recommend you do it this way. I'd go with: PHP 4, support in 5/6/7 pretty good now Zend Server - which is now free Zend Framework (framework) GoDaddy for DNS services GoDaddy for web hosting As far as email goes: get a smartmailer, which is the best way to do emails (you can use the one that comes with ZF, or you can go with a SmarterMailer) then a library that you can use to build templates That way, rather than you building it, having to explain how to setup a new platform, and I'd spend my time doing what I do well: writing code But, in the end... Is it worth it for a decent webmail client? Answer: Yes, but only if you develop a lot of code, or you don't have to have it for some time (ie. only need it for a week or so?) A report
